These Photoshop tutorials are a great way to learn how to use Photoshop to create images, edit them, manipulate them in different ways, and create special effects. 1. Creating Images with Photoshop CS5 Creating an image is one of the most basic things you can do in Photoshop. It's just a matter of understanding the different tools available and their purpose. There is the usual basic editing tools, like the clone tool, layer tools, and so on. But there are a whole lot of other features available as well that are Creating Text with Photoshop CS5 Text is often used as a design element in images, and some professionals even design their logos using the same tool: Photoshop. You'll need to understand how to use the various Photoshop text-editing tools available, including the option to change the way text is rendered on a webpage, how to add multiple text layers, and how to add text effects. Once you understand the different Photoshop text tools and you're familiar with how to create a logo, you'll be able to create a design that really fits the bill. 3. Saving the Files One of the big issues with digital cameras is that once you take a photo, the image is only in the digital realm and doesn't exist physically. To get an idea of what you have created, you'll need to save the file in a format that can be viewed on your computer and printed out. This process is called outputting your file. Photoshop has a variety of methods for saving various types of output, including JPEG, GIF, TIFF, and PSD.

Q: How to get a specific div id with child elements I'm trying to get a div with some child elements. I use this: var div = $("div#content"); Then I select a child div: var child1 = div.children("#content").children(".child1"); I try to use the following: var content = child1.text(); But it returns an empty string. I looked at the elements and I'm sure I have the div with the content and with child1. So I suppose there is something wrong with the.children part, because if I do the following: var child2 = div.children("#content").children(".child2"); Then it works! But I need to be able to use child1 instead of child2, why does this not work? A: $("div#content").children("div.child1")

Consider using a class instead of an ID.
Try the following:
$("div#content.child1") JS Fiddle:
$("div#content.child1") looks for a div with class="child1" nested inside a div with ID="content". $("div#content") looks for divs with ID="content" nested inside a div with class "content" Q: Bash - Conditional Expectation I have been trying to research a way to use bash's expect command to automate the installation process of some software. I am working with a remote linux server. I need to cd into the program directory then run ./configure to install the software and then create the executable. I am able to do this all in one go but using expect because other people will probably have this same script. So, I'd like to create 2 expect commands. The first command using the cd option takes me to the program directory and also run ./configure The second command will create the executable with the ./configure options. How do I create these 2 scripts? Using cd is the easiest but how to implement the ./configure section. I have read about the expect command but as for the conditional expectation, I'm still looking for a definitive answer. Note: I have not used bash expect

I pressed the reply button and just received the following error message: "Mailbox full. Can't send mail to folder" I went into the mailbox settings and everything was fine, it was just out of date. I did not have any other online accounts open that were using the same address as my Exchange account. I had recently changed the name of my mail account so I thought I might have been confused. Sure enough, I renamed my account again and all is well. The other online accounts are fine with their online accounts as well, so it is safe to assume that this was an Empathy bug. I'm not sure if this is because they are using Gmail and I use Microsoft Exchange since my old account has been replaced, but this should have probably been fixed by now. So I guess this was my first (but hopefully not my last) experience with this bug.[Organizational peculiarities of physical and psychic work at different stages of breast cancer
